Foreign fighters in the Syrian Civil War - Wikipedia

Abstract. This article sheds light on the identity and activities of foreign fighters who were active in Afghanistan and Pakistan between 2002 and 2006. This is done through analyzing a series of “martyr biographies”—short biographical stories of killed militants—issued by the Al Qaeda network in 2008. The study argues that there was little migration of foreign fighters from abroad to Afghanistan and Pakistan in this period, and practically no influx of fighters from Iraq.

Foreign fighters are dangerous—for the groups they join

Syria has become a magnet for foreign fighters coming from Iraq, the rebel forces of the Libyan city of Misrata, from Saudi Arabia, Iraq and Lebanon. International media and numerous experts have attributed this massive affluence of foreign fighters to al-Qaida's call on Muslims to join the Syrian revolution and fight against al-Assad's regime.

Syria: A new destination for only al-Qaida's Foreign Fighters?

Al-Qaeda in Iraq first appeared in 2004 when Abū Muṣ'ab al-Zarqāwī, a Jordanian-born militant already leading insurgent attacks in Iraq, formed an alliance with al-Qaeda, pledging his group's allegiance to Osama bin Laden in return for bin Laden's endorsement as the leader of al-Qaeda's franchise in Iraq. Al-Zarqāwī, who quickly came to be regarded as one of the most destructive militants in Iraq, organized a wave of attacks, often suicide bombings, that targeted security ...
