The history of the philosophy of perception in my view brings out a serious tension between two absolutely compelling ideas. First, the physical objects that we perceive are the very objects that are presented to us in our conscious perceptual experience. Second, those same physical objects are also mind-independent in the sense of being

This book presents, motivates, and defends a new solution to a fundamental problem in the philosophy of perception. What is the correct theoretical conception of perceptual experience, and how should we best understand the nature of our basic perceptual relation with the physical objects in the world around us? Most theorists today analyze perception in terms of its representational content ...

What is the problem of perception - Tim Crane
Objective perception means perceiving reality, all that confronts our awareness, as it is. It is a matter of seeing things as they are, rather than seeing them from a certain point of view or position. So by objective we do not mean the scientific positivist sense, in which objective means what exists physically outside us rather than in the mind.
