In Praise of Creation offers a resolution to this dilemma: nature itself asserts the existence of God. Through her observations of aspects of the natural world (a bird, a star and the flash of a tiger's eye), Jennings locates an intelligent design that, like the flowers in a garden that continue to bloom after the gardener has gone, stands as proof of God's hand at work.

‘In Praise of Limestone’ by W. H. Auden first appeared in his collection “Horizon” in 1948. It reappeared in the volume entitled “Nones” in 1962. The poem is the best example of Auden’s use of casual style and technique of working on various moods and feelings around the theme. It is kind of a philosophical poem of life.

Elizabeth Jennings's 1987 poem "In Praise of Creation" is a hymn to divine order in the natural world. Watching the lives and movements of birds, stars, and tigers, the poem's speaker sees reasons for faith in God woven all through the rhythms of nature. The mere way things are gives this speaker reason enough for believing in divinity. And ...
